AIMA'S MONTHLY E-MAGAZINE

M A N A G E M E N T T I M E S

AUGUST 2022

Dear Readers,

I am pleased to present yet another issue of AIMA News.

With your constant support and encouragement, AIMA continued to strive to build management capability through its various initiatives and programmes.

A pioneer in the field of distance education, AIMA has been constantly delivering value to students, working professionals and academia through its myriad management education programmes and courses. Over 1200 students were recently presented their management credentials at AIMA's 27th Convocation held in a physical mode after two years. Mr Suresh Prabhu, The Chief Guest on the occasion, presented the students and scholars their certificates in the presence of AIMA President, Mr CK Ranganathan and Chairman of AIMA's Board of Studies, Dr Bhimaraya Metri.

AIMA also continued its efforts to bring the constantly expanding digital universe closer to management practitioners of today. The 5th edition of AIMA's Digital & Social Marketing Retreat was held in Goa under the Chairmanship of Mr Shiv Shivakumar. The 3-day Retreat was addressed by several prominent CEOs and domain experts. Brief reports are carried inside.

Extending its outreach to the upcoming generation of managers, AIMA held the second online edition of its National Shaping Young Minds Programme (SYMP). Eminent speakers including Dr K Radhakrishnan; Mr Shiv Shivakumar; Mr Sanjiv Mehta and Ms Shereen Bhan shared their experiences with the students over candid sessions. The programme, held in conjunction with 25 Local Management Associations, witnessed a participation of over 12,000 plus young minds.

In addition, AIMA's recently instituted exclusive Women's Council - AIMA Aspire - launched its first programme, the WomenSpeak Series. The series features insights, opinions and views from iconic women achievers and leaders. The inaugural session was conducted with Ms Naina Lal Kidwai, on the theme 'Leadership in a Post Covid World - What it takes to Win' and was moderated by Aspire Chairperson, Dr Preetha Reddy; while Ms Vinita Bajoria, Co-Chairperson of AIMA Aspire presented the concluding remarks. These sessions are open to all, and the next is being planned with Ms Vanitha Narayanan in a few weeks from now.

AIMA's earlier initiative launched in the early days of the lockdown, the hugely popular LeaderSpeak Series, continued to gain further traction. The 60th edition was conducted as an online fireside chat on a very pertinent topic of current times - Metaverse; with Mr Rajan R Navani in conversation with Dr Ganesh Natarajan. You will find additional details in this issue.

Another initiative that was set up to help management professionals deal with ongoing and future disruptions, is AIMA's unique BusinessUnusual Series. The 4th edition of the series was rolled out, with 3 separate programmes conducted on topical subjects with industry experts. These programmes are aimed at preparing enterprises to get back to business quickly in the post-lockdown phase.

More details are carried inside along with brief reports on AIMA Young Leaders Council sessions, the 31st edition of the National Management Games, workshops and trainings. This edition of AIMA News also brings you the latest developments from the LMAs and some interesting articles on management.

In a few days from now, AIMA will see its customary change of guard at the 49th National Management Convention (NMC), being held in New Delhi on 20-21 September 2022. Mr Shrinivas Dempo will be taking over the reins from AIMA current President, Mr CK Ranganathan.

We do hope you would be able to join us for this year's NMC, either in person or online on AIMA's social media channels. The Convention promises to be very interesting with a stellar line-up of speakers, including the Hon'ble Vice President of India, Mr Nitin Gadkari, Mr Jyotiraditya Scindia, Mr Amitabh Kant, India's Navy Chief as well as the who's who of India Inc. We look forward to reporting details on this flagship event in our next issue.

I hope you enjoy this edition of AIMA News and look forward to your feedback and suggestions.

Warm Regards

Shaping Young Minds Programme

Dr K Radhakrishnan, Former Chairman, Space Commission/Secretary, Department of Space & Chairman, ISRO and Mr Shiv Siddhant Narayan Kaul, Managing Director, NICCO, Engineering Services Ltd and Honorary Consul General of The Republic of Korea in Kolkata

AIMA has been running a unique programme for young people called the 'Shaping Young Minds Programme' (SYMP). The programme provides a platform for young professionals and management students to interact with iconic leaders from various fields, where these leaders talk about their lives, their successes and more importantly – their failures. There are no speeches – just stories and anecdotes from life! This helps young people synchronise personal and career goals through exposure to the experience and wisdom of successful people. The idea is to provide students an opportunity to interact with achievers and learn from the experiences of those who have been there and done that.

The second online version of the National SYMP was held on 26th August 2022.

The speakers who addressed the session included Dr K Radhakrishnan, Former Chairman, Space Commission/Secretary, Department of Space & Chairman, ISRO; Mr Shiv Shivakumar, Group

WomenSpeak Series

Leadership in a Post Covid World - What it takes to Win

As part of its new initiative, AIMA Aspire has launched – WomenSpeak Series – an online series with iconic women achievers and leaders; allowing professionals and experts to learn and benefit from a woman leader's unique perspective and vision.

The first session of AIMA Aspire WomenSpeak was successfully conducted on 1st September 2022 with Ms Naina Lal Kidwai, Additional Director and Senior Advisor, Rothschild India. The theme of the session was 'Leadership in a Post Covid World - What it takes to Win' and was moderated by Dr Preetha Reddy, Chairperson, AIMA Aspire and Executive Vice Chairperson, Apollo Hospitals Enterprise Ltd. AIMA Director General, Ms Rekha Sethi commenced the session with the welcome and introductions. The session was focused on how leadership in the post-pandemic world means shifting not only management methods but also the mindset whilst continuing to navigate through the ever-changing world and providing consistent guidelines. Ms Kidwai said that we are at a juncture which will be defining for our lifetimes. This calls for redefining the roles of corporates and women; and that of technology. To succeed in these uncertain times, collaboration and the effective use of technology will hold the key.

Dr Preetha Reddy pointed out that women have become more adaptable post Covid and more of them have turned to entrepreneurship and are wanting to take up chair positions. New opportunities have come up across sectors and women have learnt to look beyond traditional roles. Ms Vinita Bajoria, Co-Chairperson, AIMA Aspire and Chairperson, Nicco Cables Ltd. delivered the vote of thanks. The session was very well received by the participants.

Hiring Female CEOs Changes How Companies Talk About Women

Women in executive positions can challenge gender stereotypes about leadership — without sacrificing their likability.

August 31, 2022 | by Lisa Wong Macabasco

Firms with women at the top were more likely to describe women as effective, independent, and determined. | Cory Hall

"We have all this knowledge on stereotypes and the biases and challenges people face, but there's still so little progress in actually diversifying the leaders of the largest companies in the country," says M. Asher Lawson, an assistant professor of decision sciences at INSEAD.

Women trying to climb the corporate ladder often run up against insidious gender stereotypes that associate men — but not women — with highly valued leadership traits of agency and achievement.

And when women do display stereotypically "male" leadership traits like assertiveness and decisiveness, they are often seen as less warm and likable.

These stereotypes may be hidden in plain view in the language a company uses to discuss leadership and women in its annual reports, proxy statements, and investor calls. So how can companies change the way they talk about women — and perhaps help break the double standard that undermines female leaders?

To answer this question, Lawson teamed up with Ashley Martin, an assistant professor of organizational behavior at Stanford Graduate School of Business. Along with Imrul Huda open in new window of the University of Chicago and Sandra Matz open in new window of Columbia University, they parsed the text of 43,000 documents produced by 39 S&P 500 companies between 2009 and 2018 — more than 1.2 billion words. Among the firms that named female CEOs during that time were GM, Yahoo!, Oracle, IBM, Duke Energy, and General Dynamics.

Leading Between the Lines

The team found, as reported in its recent paper in Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, that gender-stereotyped language decreased after firms hired women as CEOs. Appointing women to top-tier management also helped associate women with characteristics essential for leadership success. And it did so without making them seem less likable, suggesting that putting more women in positions of power isn't just a worthwhile goal but a concrete way to combat stereotypes that hold women back.

This suggests that the presence of a woman in the C-suite can be a relatively simple, effective way to reach a goal that firms are spending big money chasing. "S&P 500 organizations invest a billion dollars each year in diversity training and trying to reduce stereotypes in people's minds," says Martin. "They're trying to change these stereotypes at the employee and manager level to increase representation. But by implementing a female CEO, you might be able to do that anyway."

Typically, research into stereotyping relies on surveys or tests, which may not be ideal for probing implicit associations. "It's very difficult to get people to admit their biases in that way," Martin says. "But we're seeing it in language, in the natural way people talk about women, capturing something that's so present in the way stereotypes are being transported and transmuted across organizations and beyond. It's taking social psychology and putting it in the wild."

S&P 500 organizations invest a billion dollars each year in diversity training and trying to reduce stereotypes in people's minds.... But by implementing a female CEO, you might be able to do that anyway.

Ashley Martin

Her team dove into its trove of public documents using natural language processing, a type of artificial intelligence that can understand words' meaning in context. "We wanted to use machine learning to ask questions about gender because in the big data explosion, there's all this new text data," Lawson notes. "We wanted to look at these biases in language in ways not really done before. It's computer science and psychology working together, which has massive potential as a tool to measure culture and what's going on inside companies." This approach enabled the team to study how words relate to each other, instead of merely how many times they appeared.

Focusing on the periods before and after a company hired a woman as CEO, the researchers could discern how a business associated women with various characteristics, in essence revealing itself through its language. "Rather than just looking at what they say, it's really how they say it," Lawson explains. "No company between 2009 and 2018 is saying, 'Women are less, we're sexist' — but they are by accident. Even in these very highly controlled texts, when they're trying to be professional and represent themselves, this culture seeps through."

The research found that organizations that hire women as CEOs or directors were more likely to describe women using words typically associated with personal agency, such as "effective," "independent," and "determined." Among 11 companies that appointed female CEOs, more than two-thirds saw a stronger association between women and agency in their documents, while fewer than a third of 22 firms with male CEOs did.

One example of this effect was seen at General Motors, which named Mary Barraopen in new window, MBA '90, its CEO in 2014. It signaled the correlation between women and leadership in its 2018 definitive proxy statement, which described her as "a key leader" who had enabled "strong oversight" and kept the company "relentlessly focused on putting the customer at the center of everything we do." In contrast, after Ford named another man its CEO, it used less language linking women and agency.

Being Boss Without Backlash

However, at first it wasn't clear that this shift in corporate messaging would be a good thing in itself. "One of our main fears was that when a woman was hired as CEO, they would start to seem bossy and dominant," Lawson says. "They'd be more powerful but less likable and less associated with communal traits like being kind and caring." As Martin notes, there's a robust body of literature about this backlash effect, where women with traditionally masculine agentic traits are perceived negatively.

To the researchers' relief, the likability of female CEOs and board members didn't decrease after they stepped up. "That's phenomenal, in my mind, because you're still keeping the elements of femininity, communality, or womanhood that are really positive," Martin says. "Things like being supportive, warm, and kind — qualities that you definitely need in leadership as well." Likability doesn't have to be a trade-off for competence.

What's more, bringing female leaders into a company may lead to more women being hired, setting off a "virtuous cycle" that can have a positive impact on the entire organization's culture. Female business leaders may not only create a cascading change in a company's attitudes toward women, they may also alter our understanding of leadership. Lawson notes that they found a small increase in the association between women and communality among companies with female CEOs.

"My hope in a 50- or 100-year time horizon is not just that women are conferred agentic traits but actually we expand our definition of effective leadership to also value communality and a broader set of traits within that remit," Lawson says. "This reinforcing cycle of increased association of communality and increased representation of womanhood not only shows this cultural shift of embracing women but also of adopting a more diffuse meaning of what it means to be a good leader, which I think is really exciting."

The Costs of Being a Perfectionist Manager

by Anna Carmella G. Ocampo, Jun Gu, and Mariano Heyden

Summary.

Being a perfectionist does not mean that you are doomed as a manager: Organizational research on perfectionism is starting to provide new insights and practical evidence-based steps for managers and their network to breaking free from their perfectionistic compulsions. Fortunately, perfectionists are likely to be goal-focused and action-oriented and these strategies are aimed at helping them recalibrate their expectations.

Our obsession with perfection is increasing: A comprehensive study of perfectionism involving young adults in the UK, U.S., and Canada revealed that perfectionistic tendencies and behaviors have significantly risen — up to 32% over the past three decades. Notable figures such as tennis superstar Serena Williams and prima ballerina Karen Kain have spoken about the insidious pressures to be perfect.

They recount a perpetual cycle of dissatisfaction despite their success.

The hallmark of perfectionism is not simply the irrational need for flawlessness, but the persistent sense of dissatisfaction even when success is achieved. Worse, it can even hinder success. For instance, university professors with high levels of perfectionism rarely outperform their non-perfectionistic peers.

Growing evidence also suggests that perfectionism at work thwarts people's ability to find meaning in their work, to experience satisfaction with their jobs, and to cultivate work-life balance. Indeed, to thrive in today's competitive and complex organizational realities requires managers to accept that excellent work does not mean it is perfect or faultless. Rather, it is a developmental process, whereby employees are provided the space, time, and patience to improve their craft.

- What kind of perfectionistic manager are you?

Perfectionism manifests in different ways that influence people differentially. Managers must first identify the target of their perfectionistic standards. In other words, to whom do you impose your high standards on? Who must engage in painstaking labor to ensure that these expectations are met? Reflecting on these questions is the first step to curb the negative effects of perfectionism. To help you, we present the three common types of perfectionistic personalities.

- The self-oriented perfectionist: These managers possess internal beliefs that being perfect and striving for absolute perfection are important outcomes. They frequently have extra-punitive thoughts and negative self-evaluations when their performance falls short of their idealistic standards. While these managers are likely to show high levels of performance attainment, they are also vulnerable to anxiety, rumination, and burnout.
- The socially prescribed perfectionist: Some employees might also believe, often inaccurately, that others expect them to be perfect. They believe that respect and acceptance are conditional on their fulfillment of perfectionistic standards that their peers and superiors impose onto them. These misinterpretations of others' expectations create unnecessary pressure that make them susceptible to depression and physical illness, such as headaches, irregular sleep patterns, and eating disturbance.

- The other-oriented perfectionist: Finally, the most common type of perfectionism afflicting managers is their tendency to place high importance on others' ability and willingness to strive for perfection. These managers demand the highest performance standards from others and they often evaluate their colleagues stringently. As a result, managers with elevated other-oriented perfectionism sabotage their relationships and reputation in the workplace because of their tendency to incite fear and to display excessive anger and hostility especially when others fail to meet their performance expectations.

- Avoiding the Pitfalls of Perfectionism

If you recognize yourself or your employees in the above scenarios, you are not alone, nor does it mean that you are doomed as a manager. Organizational research on perfectionism is starting to provide new insights and practical evidence-based steps for managers and their network to breaking free from their perfectionistic compulsions. Fortunately, perfectionists are likely to be goal-focused and action-oriented and these strategies are aimed at helping them recalibrate their expectations. Based on our collective experience studying effective leadership strategies as well as our expertise on perfectionism across workplaces, we offer the following strategies to help you manage your perfectionism.

- Design the right goals.

One of the most useful things perfectionists, and those who work with them, can do is to design goals to be attainable yet challenging. This can support employees' efficiency and sustain their motivation to succeed. For perfectionistic managers, high performance expectations may be set for short-duration projects that require maximum effort (e.g., solving problems, addressing crises situations).

Keep in mind, however, that progress is more important than perfection. Initial successes in these goals can be leveraged to encourage the accomplishment of important tasks while sustaining their employees' enthusiasm. Acknowledging small wins can reinforce the rewards of progress.

- Recognize failure as part of the process.

Managers should make a deliberate effort to recognize that failures and mistakes are ubiquitous aspects of the work process. Doing so would encourage them to grant their employees the flexibility to treat mistakes as learning opportunities.

Perfectionistic managers must recognize that intolerance of mistakes and failures can spoil creativity. Employees who are reprimanded from taking risks and making mistakes often dwell on their failures, leading them to be too exhausted to produce insightful and novel work. This would further enable employees to broaden their perspectives, to find novel solutions to problems, and to discover new ways of doing things.

- Cultivating mindfulness.

Practicing mindfulness may especially benefit perfectionistic managers. It encourages self-compassion by preventing the formation of self-critical and catastrophic thinking when their perfectionistic standards are threatened.

Mindfulness may help perfectionists to slow down and regulate emotions. For example, research shows that musicians with perfectionistic tendencies who meditate at least once a week are better at managing music performance anxiety. Further evidence reports that perfectionistic workers who completed a six-week mindfulness-based bibliotherapy intervention experienced less stress and negative emotions.

- Using pep talks.

Counseling psychologists endorse positive self-talks to overcome hypercritical thoughts, and it can be worthwhile for people to develop a set of mantras to help themselves and others handle perfectionism. For example, a self-oriented perfectionist might need to tell themselves: "Wanting to be perfect is impossible and exhausting for me. There is no reason for me to spend a lot of time on everything. I must let myself relax if I want to carry on in the long term." Managers with employees exhibiting self-oriented perfectionism may say, "You do not always have to work alone. You can always reach out to me when you get stuck at a task. Great work is not achieved by one person overnight."

We've found similar responses for the other types of perfectionists, too. Managers with socially prescribed perfectionism might need to tell themselves: "My contributions are sufficient. No one will think of me any less just because of a tiny error I made.” If you find yourself working with a staff member who displays socially prescribed perfectionism, it may be worth reminding them that their work success and even failures do not define them. You may say, “You do not have to prove yourself to us. We have always admired your work and dedication. Your contributions are valued as long as you tried your hardest.”

Finally, managers with other-oriented perfectionism can tell themselves: “I don’t have to push people to get things done my way. They are here because they are capable in their own right.” As a manager of an employee who expects perfection from their colleagues, you might say: “You will learn tremendously from others when you allow them to work at their own pace and handle failures together. People have a way of surpassing even your own expectations.”

Such pep talks boost positive evaluations of the self and others, and also address perfectionists’ irrational and nagging beliefs that a person’s worth is tied to their accomplishments.

● Fostering positive interpersonal relationships.

At its core, perfectionists strive to gain others’ validation. While perfectionism predisposes individuals to more conflict with others, studies demonstrate that support from peers buffer the negative consequences of perfectionism. For example, perfectionistic managers with access to social support from family and friends cope better in stressful situations because of the advice, esteem, and encouragement they receive.

To develop more positive social experiences, perfectionists need to remember that not all social interactions are about problem-solving and winning — rather, they need to focus on empathy instead of competing with others and giving unsolicited advice. One study suggests that perfectionists who channel their competitive spirits into helping others finish their work enable them to foster positive interactions with others. The ensuing positive social experiences with peers can help reduce anxiety, depression, and overall stress arising from perfectionistic endeavors. This will further enhance their social skills and help them see others as collaborators instead of rivals.

● Managing emotions.

Managers who consistently demand perfection from their subordinates may unknowingly express intense anger, irritability, and frustration. As such, they might benefit from developing emotions-based strategies to communicate their high performance standards in a sensitive and empathic manner.

In emotionally charged situations, managers can avoid overreacting by stepping back from the situation and reframing the situation using a more positive lens. For example, when a subordinate falls short of their performance goals, perfectionistic managers can highlight the new knowledge, skills, and experience that the subordinate has gained. Reframing performance in this manner instead of absolute failures can direct subordinates to focus on improving future performance.

Finally, they can also dampen negative emotions such as frustration and dissatisfaction by using humor when their perfectionistic standards are threatened. As Brian Wilson of The Beach Boys recounted, “I was a real perfectionist, and the guys respected that. But we always used humor to lighten the load.”

● Key Takeaway: Reconsider Work that Is Good Enough.

Intense competition and low tolerance for errors in modern workplaces have forced managers to set exceedingly demanding performance standards. Although some may claim that combining high performance expectations with rigid patterns of evaluations may raise performance, the infatuation with perfection can derail engagement, relationships, and satisfaction with work and life. Ultimately, we tend to perform better at work — and can even be happier — when we are consistently “good enough” instead of sporadically perfect.
