MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR GENERAL

Dear Readers,

I am pleased to present another issue of AIMA News.

As the apex body of the management profession in India, AIMA always strives to bring the latest management thought, innovation and leadership to the forefront; while acting as a catalyst to trigger thinking and augment knowhow.

Building on the success of its extremely popular residential retreats, AIMA organised the first Vice Chancellors' Retreat in Varanasi. Curated and customised especially for Academic leaders and institutional heads, the Retreat facilitated discussions and an exchange of ideas to address current challenges and explore opportunities in higher education. Addressed by some very eminent faculty and academic thought leaders, the Retreat provided valuable insights for strategic planning and innovation in academia.

Further in the area of academics and knowledge, AIMA partnered with IIT Bombay for a one-day conference on how organisations need to prepare for the AI revolution and address technology risks. Held at the IIT Bombay campus, the programme featured several subject matter experts and academic stalwarts, exploring the complexities of AI integration in an organisational context. Additionally, AIMA's collaboration with the World Bank continued to gain strength with another in-company Contract Management and Dispute Resolution programme held in Shillong last month. Brief reports can be found inside.

The past few weeks saw AIMA reach out to the younger generation through various initiatives.

During the month, AIMA successfully completed three of its flagship competitions and simulation championships. The highlight was the roll out of the Golden Jubilee edition of AIMA's longstanding National Competition for Young Managers. The active participation at each year's programme is a testament to the enduring legacy and success of the event.

Another longstanding competition, the AIMA Student Management Games, held its 27th edition this year. Based on AIMA's indigenous software "Chanakya," students competed in a simulated business environment, making the learning process truly unique. This year's Student Management Quiz also saw active participation from students across the country competing over 6 regional rounds, which culminated in a National Grand Finale in Delhi NCR.

Meanwhile, AIMA's special forum for rising leaders – the AIMA Young Leaders' Council continued to offer diverse opportunities for its members to connect, engage, and explore emerging trends for their professional growth. The Council organised two engaging and insightful sessions during the month. One focussed on the current Tech opportunities in India, while another explored how India could leverage its demographic dividend. Further details are provided inside.

AIMA's network of Local Management Associations remains an integral part of our overall endeavour to build management capability across the nation. To support this, AIMA set up the Regional Coordination Meetings for mutual learning and best practice sharing. Three such meetings were held recently with participating LMAs from the Northern, Southern, and Eastern regions. These meetings are highly beneficial for improving collaboration and enhancing the effectiveness of LMAs in their respective areas.

You will find brief reports in this issue along with other updates from the LMAs and a few articles on management.

I hope you enjoy this issue of AIMA News and look forward to your feedback and suggestions.

Warm regards,

The Children's Art Museum of India

The Children's Art Museum of India (CAMI) is an initiative founded by Ms. Manya Roongta and Mr. Krish Nawal with the vision of being "By the Children, Of the Children, For the Children." CAMI provides a unique platform where children's artistic talents can flourish, showcasing diverse artworks from young artists worldwide.

CAMI offers free art lessons accessible to all children through its Learn page, ensuring that every child has the opportunity to develop their artistic skills. The museum keeps the community inspired with regular newsletters and blogs, providing insights into various aspects of art and creativity. This encourages continuous learning and emphasises the importance of parent and educator involvement in nurturing children's creativity.

Collaborating with schools to integrate art education into their curriculums, CAMI establishes dedicated galleries within schools to showcase and preserve students' artistic journeys. These partnerships aim to inspire audiences for years to come. CAMI also organises Monthly Art Fests with new topics each month, providing a dynamic platform for young artists to express themselves.

To promote child citizenship, CAMI allows children to vote for their favourite artists. This democratic approach empowers young artists, giving them a voice in the artistic community. Embracing modern technology, CAMI offers an immersive experience in the Metaverse, allowing children and visitors to explore the museum virtually. This innovative approach makes CAMI accessible to a global audience.

Art plays a crucial role in developing empathy, understanding, patience, and balance—virtues essential in today's volatile, uncertain, complex, and ambiguous (VUCA) world. CAMI's 200,000+ visitors and 20,000+ active members testify to the significant impact art has on creating a softer, more compassionate world.

As CAMI continues to inspire and support young artists, it seeks the continued patronage and support of its community. By spreading the word and getting involved, everyone can help nurture the next generation of artists. The Children's Art Museum of India stands as a testament to the power of art in shaping young minds and fostering a global community of creative individuals.

3 Ways to Clearly Communicate Your Company's Strategy

by Constantinos C. Markides and Andrew MacLennan

May 24, 2024

Summary: For all the communication around strategy, we know that leaders at many companies don't provide the necessary context for employees to understand what the words and sentences in a strategy statement actually mean. What can leaders do to help employees understand enough context to understand a strategy? In this article, the authors offer three recommendations: 1) Present the alternatives considered and explain why they were not adopted. 2) Explain how each choice is linked to the organization's purpose. 3) Involve employees in strategy development.

A pilot once told us a story about an accident on an early morning flight in the 1950s. As the aircraft accelerated to take off, the captain noticed his flight engineer's sullen expression and called out, "Cheer up, George." But in his sleepy state, what the engineer heard was, "Gear up, George" — and he duly raised the landing gear — prematurely as they were not quite airborne. The aircraft sank onto its fuselage and slid to a halt, causing much damage. Luckily, nobody was hurt.

The story illustrates an important point: miscommunication and misunderstanding are both much more likely when context is unclear or not shared. Had George known that the topic of conversation was his mood rather than the flying of the plane, he would have been less likely to misunderstand what his captain was communicating to him, and he most certainly would not have acted the way he did.

What does this have to do with strategy? In survey

After survey, employees of even successful companies claim that they do not know their organizations' strategies. This is not for lack of communication by top management because the evidence shows that leaders spend a lot of time, effort, and resources trying to explain strategy to their people. George's story suggests an explanation.

Our experience suggests that leaders at many companies communicate strategy without providing the necessary context for employees to understand what the words and sentences in a strategy statement mean or why a particular strategy was chosen, relative to others considered and rejected. For example, a statement that says: "a key element of our strategy is to leverage the benefits of our integrated model" may make perfect sense to the leader who has thought deeply about the company's business model but may mean nothing to the average employee who does not even understand what an integrated model is or why this particular model was chosen in the first place.

Why don't leaders provide this context? Quite simply, the answer is that it is impossible. When they make big and difficult choices that strategy requires, corporate leaders have considered a wealth of data and information about competitors, customers and market dynamics, utilizing in the process their own judgment — and that of other executives and advisers — developed over many years of experience. They cannot even begin to communicate all the implicit, often tacit knowledge that brought them to a particular decision, which means that they can never really explain their choices.

So what can leaders do to help employees understand context enough to understand a strategy?

1. Present the rejected alternatives.

Explaining why not can often help you explain why. In presenting a strategy, therefore, you can also present the alternatives considered and explain why they were not adopted. Consider, for example, the experience of the St Louis-based partnership of Edward Jones, a leading firm in the U.S. brokerage industry. In an interview with one of us, the late John Bachmann who served as the firm's managing partner during 1980-2003, articulated their strategy as follows:

"Unlike most other competitors in the industry, we target and sell only to individual investors, not to institutional ones. Within this segment, we focus on individuals in rural America, not in urban areas. What we sell to them is "peace of mind" and, as a result, we do not sell exotic derivatives or risky products— instead we select transparent and safe products to promote. Unlike our competitors that sell their own in-house mutual funds, we do not manufacture the products that we sell. Instead of big offices in large cities, we have small offices that are placed in small communities to be convenient for the customer. In addition, each office is run by one, not two and not three Investment Representatives."

Note how prominently the word "not" features. Pharma firm Roche similarly places its decision to focus on prescription medicines and diagnostics in context by highlighting their decision not to invest in alternative sectors such as generics, biosimilars, over-the-counter medicines, and medical devices.

Communicating a strategy in this manner allows people to not only understand what choices were made but also what alternatives were considered for each choice. More importantly, it invites people to either ask for clarification as to why the alternatives were rejected or challenge the choices made by top management. It is the discussion that follows such challenges or clarification requests that eventually lead to a better understanding of strategy, not whether the original communication was clear.

2. Link to purpose.

You should also link your strategic decisions to your company's purpose or goal. Explaining to employees how each choice is linked to the organization's purpose is a good way for people to quickly understand the logic behind the choice without needing to know all the deliberations that took place to make the choice.

Take DPG Media Group, the leading media company in Belgium and the Netherlands, which publishes largely in Dutch. In an interview with one of us, the Group Chairman, Christian Van Thillo, stated that the critical assumption the company had made at the outset of the digital era was that people would continue to rely on professional media rather than citizen journalism, blogs, and influencers. As a result, the company adopted the digital delivery of high-quality, professional journalism as its strategic goal.

The company always uses this goal as the starting point to explain its strategic decisions to employees. For example, in presenting DPG's decision to engage in acquisitions for the first time in their history, Van Thillo pointed out that to be a leading provider of professional journalism in the digital context, DPG needed to compete with Google and Facebook for advertisers, which meant they had to be big enough in their markets so that local advertisers and consumers would have them top of mind. Similarly, in explaining the decision to focus on just two markets, Belgium and the Netherlands, Van Thillo pointed out that DPG could not afford to be big in many markets without undermining the quality of its journalism.

3. Involve employees in strategy development.

Employee participation and inclusion in the strategy process can take many forms, from simply soliciting ideas and feedback through to active participation in strategy workshops and testing of new strategic initiatives. At the upstream end, for example, we find the German drinks producer Premium-Kollektiv, which allows any interested employee to set a strategy dialogue in motion, through a process that is entirely transparent. Issues can be raised or responded to by anyone in the collective via posting to an emailing list. Lively debates can develop and decisions are largely reached through consensus emerging, sometimes gradually.

As strategic dialogues deepen, more employees will get involved, and with their involvement comes a greater shared familiarity of the context in which the strategy is developed. For example, at gaming company Valve, employees proposing strategic initiatives must persuade at least two colleagues to form a team to implement initiatives. As the development proceeds, more people join, which means that more people get a sense of what the initiative is trying to do.

Technology is a great enabler of employee participation. For example, as part of its strategy development process, global tire manufacturer Bridgestone is experimenting with AI-powered surveying of employees. The technology enables interactive dialogue with staff, efficiently and at scale, aiming to uncover information and insights to inform strategic planning. Jake Rønsholt, who leads strategy and transformation in the EMEA region explains, "We want to involve and engage a broad range of staff in the development process. AI-powered surveying 'prods' interviewees to consider what lies behind their answers, creating deeper and clearer insights on which we can build."

For effective execution of strategy, employees need to know and understand the choices that their organization has made. Unfortunately, even clear communication of these choices is not enough because communication in the absence of context can lead to misunderstandings and lack of clarity.

Since it is impossible for leaders to explain the full context in which they made their strategy choices, they have to find different ways to help their employees understand and appreciate their choices. Involving employees in the development of strategy, linking the choices made to the organization's purpose, and communicating not only the choices made but the alternatives considered and rejected can be effective ways to bring employees on board quickly and make the strategy choices more memorable.

Career Advice: How to Become a “Friction Fixer”

Tips for eliminating those annoying obstacles that get in the way of your best work.

by Audrey Kim
February 01, 2024

Emails that drone on and on. Meetings that could have been Slack messages. Memos loaded with empty jargon. We’re all familiar with friction, or what Robert I. Sutton and Huggy Rao describe as “forces that make it harder, slower, more complicated, or downright impossible to get things done.”

In their new book, The Friction Project: How Smart Leaders Make the Right Things Easier and the Wrong Things Harder, Sutton (a professor of organizational behavior, by courtesy, at Stanford Graduate School of Business and professor emeritus of management science and engineering at Stanford) and Rao (a professor of organizational behavior at Stanford GSB) offer a wealth of advice on identifying and removing troublesome friction — while implementing the helpful kind. Here are some tips for aspiring “friction fixers”:

Less Is More: We often believe that adding stuff is an improvement. Calling extra meetings or creating new positions might feel productive but may do more harm than good. To combat “addition bias,” Sutton and Rao recommend locating subtraction targets. Try “the rule of halves”: a thought experiment where you reduce something (like the length of a meeting) by 50% and only add back what's truly missing.

Value People's Time: The hallmark of great friction fixers is their consideration of other people's time. Sutton shares an example from an unexpected place — the California DMV, where he saw a friendly employee make their way down a line of 50 people, handing out forms (and pens) so some could finish their business on the spot and others could wrap up their appointments more quickly. Thanks to this helpful friction fixer, Sutton was out of the DMV in half an hour.

Get Rid of Gobbledygook: Overly complex lingo can be confusing. Take the management framework Holacracy, which is full of lines like this: "A Role may link into another Circle if a Policy of that other Circle or any Super-Circle thereof invites it." To avoid "the hazards of convoluted crap," Sutton and Rao suggest speaking or writing in concrete terms, incorporating sensory metaphors, and using the present tense.

Slow Down: Some friction is good. Sometimes, you must get your employees or colleagues to resist impulsive or instinctive moves. In particular, generating great ideas can't be rushed. "To do creative work right, teams need to slow down, struggle, and develop a lot of bad ideas to find a rare good one," Sutton and Rao write. After launching a new project, take a moment for some "imaginary time travel." Generate "previctorems" in which your team sketches out the story of its future success and "premortems" in which you speculate about massive failure.

Everyone Can Fix Friction: Friction elimination is both top-down and bottom-up. Hawaii Pacific Health's Getting Rid of Stupid Stuff (GROSS) campaign was initiated by a chief medical officer but driven by doctors and nurses who flagged tasks that cut into their time with patients — like a mouse click that was sucking up 1,700 hours of nurses' time every month. While senior executives may initiate systemic change, every member of an organization can contribute to friction fixing.
